Plants In The Workplace

Why You Need Plants

Indoor environments are rife with harmful pollutants – cleaning chemicals, carpet glue fumes, dust and other particulate matter. Many people are unaware that plants act as natural filters for these harmful pollutants by filtering them out and providing fresh, clean air.

“If people are to move into closed environments, on Earth or in space, they must take along nature’s life support system; plants.” —B.C. Wolverton, NASA scientist

The Science of Plants

In the last decades of the 20th century, NASA conducted research into the role of plants as a means of air filtration for space missions. A scientist by the name of B.C. Wolverton discovered that plants emit water vapor which creates a pumping action to pull contaminated air down around a plant’s roots where it is then converted into food for the plant.

Additionally, Japanese scientists expanding on Wolverton’s bioremediation research discovered that plants also play a significant role in psychological welfare and that people actually recover from illness faster in the presence of plants*.
